Optimizing Code for Performance: Reading ./code --poetry

Introduction: code poetry's compound eye

There is something unnerving about staring at an eye, especially one that meets your gaze. In our book ./code --poetry, “compound_eye.rb” (see Holden and Kerr 2016a) spans two facing pages, and it appears to look at the reader from each page. “compound_eye.rb” is a code poem, written in the Ruby programming language.<sup>1</sup> We can think of code poetry as a subset of Alan Sondheim’s category “‘Codework’ – the computer stirring into the text, and the text stirring the computer.” Sondheim also describes codework as part of a movement “concerned with the intermingling of human and machine” (Sondheim 2001, 1). A close reading, and seeing, of “compound_eye.rb” will serve as an introduction to our project ./code --poetry, and to the visual aesthetics of code poetry in general.

On the right-hand page is a functional computer program that has been altered poetically in a way that is human-readable. The code poem is arranged on the page so that the central section looks like a hexagonal ommatidium: one of the many units that make up an insect’s eye. On the left-hand side of the page are five snapshots from an animation that the code poem creates when it is run on a computer. Like the code poem, the output is made of alphanumeric characters. The output is an example of ASCII art, comprised of characters defined by the American Standard Code for Information Interchange. The text describes a patient who has undergone surgery. The patient experiences insects crawling on their body. The insects may or may not be hallucinations.

So far, we have described the print version of “compound_eye.rb,” but it also exists online. The website <https://code-poetry.com> (see Holden and Kerr 2016b) hosts some of the code poems from our book. In the online version, we see not static flipbook frames but a moving ASCII animation, a looping GIF of the code poem’s output. There is no single object to look at here: the code poem exists as input and output, in print and online (Fig. 18).

W. J. T. Mitchell writes that “the very notion of vision as a cultural activity necessarily entails an investigation of its non-cultural dimensions, its pervasiveness as a sensory mechanism that operates in animal organisms all the way from the flea to the elephant” (Mitchell 2002, 92). “compound_eye.rb,” with its flea’s
