

OECD Environmental Performance Review Programme

Accountability Over Learning?

PLACING QUESTIONS

Journal of Economic Surveys (forthcoming issue)

The growing interest in evaluation as a new form of governmental governance stems from two developments: the increasing complexity of public problems, and the search for more public instruments for managing economic uncertainty and shifting of costs in the pursuit of sustainable development. The latter leads increasing accountability as the main purpose of evaluation while the former stresses the importance of learning. These approaches are often considered as mutually exclusive but recent literature has underlined their complementary roles in policy making. This article examines to what extent the OECD Environmental Performance Review (EPR) programme has succeeded in combining the objectives of learning and accountability within a single evaluation framework. The EPRs have been relatively successful in meeting the former role while often associated with ineffective performance improvements that have usually failed to generate direct action. Focusing on learning accountability through social learning might contribute substantially to combining the problem.
