Belling,2013-11-11 In the working world the weal and woe of the largely defenseless individual is vested in the hands of the collective powers The trust placed in these powers stands in stark contrast to the widespread distrust of the democratic constitutional state While legal protection vis a vis the state has been extended in a very sophisticated and flexible manner often to an extreme degree the question of how the employee and the employer can be protected against breaches of duty on the part of the works council Betriebsrat under the German industrial governance laws has yet to be resolved This is a highly relevant issue of great social and political explosiveness The question is how much latitude the collective powers should have to act according to their own discretion without being compelled to answer not only to the employees but also to the employers as well In light of the legal protection that has been developed for the past hundred years and more and particularly the continued expansion of the individual's legal protection vis a vis the state powers since the Basic Law Grundgesetz entered into force the control held by the intermediary powers and thus also the works council appears almost anachronistic In the past ten years this deficiency in the legal protection provided under the industrial governance laws has increasingly forced its way into the line of vision of the German labor law scholars
