Schneider, 2001-07-22 An automotive empire controls the forms of our cities and therefore dominates the lives of people      Automobility limits citizenship depriving the poor elderly children and handicapped of the most ordinary human rights Using contemporary sources Kenneth Schneider traces the rise of the automobile from the toy of the rich to the necessity of the poor and the deprivation of all He stresses the irony of how early automobile enthusiasm resulted in today s harsh auto dominated realities cities converted from human to automotive scale the loss of urban open space to consumptive suburban sprawl the billions of hours lost in traffic congestion annually a greater human loss of life to accidents than from all America s wars the promoted consumption of declining fuel and other resources Human values and the content of civilization are rocked asunder by commandments to increase exclusive automobile travel Whereas the basic value of city life derives from minimizing the need to travel cities today are stretched to demand ever more travel in misshaped human environments that ironically promote a negative result of economic growth But human beings are resilient and do learn They can reverse course and build vibrant environments in the image of their own scale visions and values Autokind Vs Mankind aims at that potential
