turbulent waters of Canada's contested lands and resources Drawing on personal experiences and the wisdom of Indigenous elders and scholars Marc G Stevenson offers unique insights into how settler society has dismantled Indigenous knowledge and governance systems while expropriating their lands and resources In particular he explores the contentious spaces where the land use rights and knowledge claims of the two cultures collide and examines why the promise of reconciliation remains so elusive Lastly he considers how we might transform our mindsets from that of colonial agents to that of post colonial allies In its forward looking conclusion Do You Eat the Red Ones Last identifies some directions that might collectively take us on a more ethical and rewarding path to reparations and co existence As such it joins a growing body of critical thought committed to generating real opportunity for reconciling Indigenous settler rights in Canada
