Author: Aleksandrs Cepilovs*

Introduction

This paper aims at discussing the applicability of experimental methods, and specifically randomized controlled trials (RCT) in evaluating social innovation and innovation in public sector organisations. The reasons for addressing the question of applicability of experimental evaluation methods in context of public sector or social innovation are manifold: first of all, in the recent years social innovation and innovation in the public sector have come to the forefront of the debate in public policy-making as well as innovation research; secondly, in the recent call for papers for a panel on social innovation at one of the conferences panel chairs encouraged submissions of experimental studies, arguing that currently there are very few of those; lastly, there arguably exists a gap in methods for evaluation of both public sector and social innovation and therefore experimental methods (including RCTs) are viewed as one of the possible approaches to evaluation.

Social innovation is high on the agenda of governments around the world and particularly so in Europe, where the concept of social innovation can be encountered in policy documents ranging from social policy to innovation policy and beyond. The reasons for such popularity of the concept are simple. On the one hand there are pressing societal challenges, such as ageing populations, public health-related challenges (obesity, depressions etc.) or environmental challenges. Public sector plays a central role in resolving most if not all social challenges, as some of those are related to the so-called economic externalities, for which businesses are not responsible thus shifting the burden to the domain of governments. On the other hand resolving societal challenges puts additional pressure on governments' finances. Given the pressures on both demand and supply sides, governments need to seek solutions to act upon existing challenges with fewer resources. The concept of social innovation therefore is proposed as one of the approaches to effectively tackle the pressing challenges and address the societal needs. Particularly actively the concept of social innovation has been discussed and also applied in practice in countries where involvement of the private and the third sector in provision of social and welfare services has comparatively long history (e.g. the UK, Netherlands, Australia and New Zealand). The National Endowment for Science, Technology and Arts (NESTA) in the UK under the guidance of its CEO and, perhaps, one of the most prominent proponents of social innovation, Geoff Mulgan, has been actively involved in studying social innovation in its
