Metropolitan City Expenditures A Comparative Analysis:

Metropolitan City Expenditures Roy W. Bahl, 2014-07-15 In this study of the structure of core city expenditures Mr Bahl analyzes the functional relationship between per capita expenditures and selected economic demographic and sociological factors He finds that the problems central to intercity variations in per capita spending are directly related to the coordination of fiscal and physical planning and that economic and social areas not corporate boundaries represent the most appropriate planning units Mr Bahl extends the static analysis of the pioneering work of Harvey Brazer to a comparative static and temporal context comparing through regression techniques the factors underlying per capita variations in 198 Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area cities from 1950 to 1960 His results suggest that the different levels may be primarily attributed to interactions between the central city and the urban fringe and to disparities in the dependence on inter government revenues

Using numerous governmental documents and conducting extensive interviews with local state and federal officials the author examines how the two cities have implemented both federal redistributive and development programs in education and housing The author uses three models in explaining city choices economic constraint clientele participation and institutional diversity and concludes by offering his political choice perspective which identifies specific sets of local political forces that are likely to alter the city's rational choices in development and redistributive issues
