Abstract

Nature rehabilitation has become a major policy in river management in the Netherlands. A scenario approach combined with an expert system can support decision making. The methodology is illustrated by two case studies at different scales. In the Rhine-Econet study three scenarios for river management are presented and evaluated for the network function of some bird species. A second case concerns the Gelderse Poort area with two scenarios both aimed to enlarge the surface of the natural areas but in a different way. By means of the GIS-based landscape ecological decision support system LEDESS the ecological impact on vegetation and fauna has been assessed. Results are discussed. Although a lot of assumptions have to be made the results of both studies facilitate discussion and decision making about which nature policy targets are desirable and realistic.

1. Introduction

During the last decade the concept of river rehabilitation was introduced in river management in the Netherlands (Van Dijk et al. 1995). This policy is related to political issues such as sustainable exploitation of natural resources and biodiversity and has been enhanced by the need to reduce the total area of agricultural land, due to increasing production surpluses. In the past, river floodplains were predominantly used by agriculture in spite of seasonal inundation. Nowadays, the same conditions give restricted use to agriculture, so that floodplain areas may be transformed into nature areas. Those floodplains are considered now as important areas for nature rehabilitation. Changes in land use, however, may have serious impact on other river functions which also have to be fulfilled. Situated within the most densely populated part of Europe, the River Rhine is intensively used for navigation. Extremely high discharges in 1993 and 1995 have stressed again the water discharge function and flood protection as high-priority issues (Silva & Kok 1996).

Thus, modern river management is confronted with conflicting interests and land use claims from various sectors. The outcome of the future developments in these sectors is uncertain. To cope with this uncertainty, scenario studies are believed to be useful tools in the decision making process. However, examples of scenario studies for nature policy are scarce. This paper will contribute to a methodology of scenario studies on nature policy for river systems.

First, the scenario approach will be introduced as well as the decision support instrument used for comparison of outcomes of the various scenarios for nature poli-

Restoration of Degraded Rivers: Challenges, Issues and Experiences

D.P. Loucks, 2013-04-17 In the continued quest for increased economic benefits from our water resources numerous structures and operating policies for controlling the river flow have been built and implemented These structures and associated operating policies can facilitate navigation they can provide greater quantities of reliable water supplies to meet agricultural industrial and municipal water demands they can generate hydroelectric power and energy and they can provide increased flood protection recreation and other benefits Over the past half century we have converted many of our rivers into engineered waterways These straightened often periodically dredged engineered rivers are complete with dikes reservoirs weirs and diversion canals All this engineering has enhanced economic development However as rivers and their floodplains become stressed from the excessive use and misuse of their resources their contribution to economic development can be threatened Evidence of economic and ecological degradation especially in relatively large river systems such as the Danube the Mississippi the Rhine and the Volga has increased our appreciation of beneficial roles natural aquatic and terrestrial ecosystems play in water quantity and quality management We have recognized the need to pay more attention to letting nature help us regulate water quantity and quality rather than working against nature and its variabilities and uncertainties Today there are efforts underway in many developed river basins to de engineer or return these straightened and controlled rivers to a more natural state
