The Role of Research and Technology in the Changing Ocean Economy

Proceedings of a Workshop—in Brief

Oceans have long been a frontier of opportunity for exploration, scientific understanding, commerce, and trade for the United States. The transformative technologies of the fourth industrial revolution—artificial intelligence, machine learning, robotics, Internet of Things, biotechnology, advanced materials—are expected to recondition traditional ocean-based industries and enable the growth of new markets prioritizing sustainability. At the nexus of unprecedented environmental change and rapid technology innovation, how should the United States position itself as a leader in the global ocean economy? On February 4 and 5, 2020, the Government-University-Industry Research Roundtable (GUIRR) convened experts to discuss the importance of cross-sector collaboration and the opportunities for U.S. leadership in the context of a changing ocean and a changing ocean economy. Not all aspects of marine research and technology could be discussed in the limited time frame of the workshop, but the dialogue identified a broad range of emerging technologies that will impact the changing ocean economy.

Susan Avery, President Emerita at Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution, delivered the workshop's keynote address. She began by contextualizing the size of the ocean, which covers two-thirds of the planet, is on average two kilometers deep, and contains the world's longest mountain ranges and tallest mountains. It holds most of the water on Earth, which drives our planetary climate system and water cycle and makes the planet habitable for humans. The ocean contains more than 90 percent of the world's biodiversity, an ecosystem that delivers a rich source of food for humanity. Approximately 4.5 percent of the global population lives within a mile of the ocean, but all humans depend on it. Avery noted, "In terms of our impact on the oceans, nearly every material made by humanity has a good chance of ending up in the ocean."

Avery stated that addressing the global issues around the ocean economy requires broader systems thinking. Consideration of both natural and human systems is necessary to comprehend the complexities of ocean science and policy. She reminded attendees that though the planet's ocean and atmosphere are generally studied as separate entities, the two systems are connected in a constant exchange of heat, moisture, and nutrients. Additional research and technology is needed to expand our understanding of these exchanges.

Addressing the gaps and challenges in ocean research is difficult, given the conditions of the research environment—withstanding the navigation challenges, depth, pressure, cold, and dark is a feat in itself. Despite these challenges, improving our understanding of the ocean and its related systems is critical, given how limited our knowledge about the ocean continues to be. Satellite remote sensing is an important asset for measuring ocean surface conditions, but it does not provide the needed measurements below the surface. A new generation of scientific and engineering tools, including advanced co-robotic systems, sensors, and eDNA, will broaden in-situ observational abilities and advance the science needed to support a robust blue economy.

Avery noted that the natural and economic systems related to the ocean touch the lives of all humans. The ecosystem services provided by the ocean are provided largely for free, though their economic value is estimated to be in the trillions of dollars. The aforementioned advancements in ocean data collection and analysis are pieces of what some call the "blue economy"—essentially an information and knowledge generating economy. Examples of blue economy activity include ocean technology, ocean energy and resources, fisheries and aquaculture, biotechnology and bioprospecting, coastal tourism and recreation, and informatics for decision-making support.
