This Italian favourite has a smallish stature, long walk, and energetic trot, which make it ideal for farm work.

The most popular heavy breed in Italy is the Italian Heavy Draught horse, sometimes called the Italian Agricultural horse. It is found throughout southern and central Italy, but chiefly around Rome.

In development dates from a time when Italian farmers required a quick-moving horse of smaller proportions to carry out general light agricultural work. To improve the rather poor local stock, breeders imported the massive and energetic Breton (see p.76) from Belgium. The resulting cross produced powerful offspring, but they were also too heavy and too slow. A more successful cross was with the Breton, especially the lighter, quick-moving Breton type (see p.68). This was favoured for its quick-moving action, which came via its connection with the Flemish Trakehner (see p.137). When crossed with Italian stock, the progeny was compact and relatively fast-moving, thrived on cereals with little, and, despite its size, was hardy and also economical to keep. Their speed, most appreciated by Italian farmers, accounts for the Italian name for this breed, l'asino, meaning 'quick heavy draught'.

There is some variation in the appearance of the Italian Heavy Draught, the legacy of the few half-blood Italian sires. In particular the limbs can be good. They often lack bone, the joints are small and rounded, and the pasterns are upright, while the feet are heavy. The overall constitution shows the benefits of the Breton influence and the head is surprisingly fine for a heavy breed. There is also more than a suggestion of the smaller and lighter Trakehner (see p.136), which, as a cross-breed, may well have been limited in the otherwise nondescript heavy stock. Today the Italian Heavy Draught is bred for its use as well as for working purposes.

THE ITALIAN HEAVY DRAUGHT HAS A STRONG FOLLOWING IN ITALY. IN 2010, REGISTERED HORSES EXCEEDED 6,500.

SYMBOL OF VERONA

The heavy head of the Italian Heavy Draught has the long neck under a small head. This is a result of the genetic drifts and the power of the Breton parent stock, which brought the small, round-headed type into the mix. It is a result of the genetic drifts and the power of the Breton parent stock, which brought the small, round-headed type into the mix.
