

INTRODUCTION

Ninety miles east of Vancouver in the quiet community of Hope there used to be a small wooden-frame railway station nestled amid a grove of fir trees at the north end of Third Avenue. It was hardly an unusual station in outward appearances. Its architectural lines were pleasing, but nonetheless utilitarian and without embellishment. A pair of red mail boxes, one marked "East" and the other marked "West", hung by the doorway. Next to them a faded blackboard showed all trains to be "OT". A brace of train order hoops dangled from a wooden peg next to the station bay window, while overhead a pair of brightly painted red and white semaphore signals pointed skyward. It was, in every appearance, just another one of the many thousand small town railway stations once scattered across this broad land. Even the tuscan red paint with which the station was chalked — well, who could say that that paint has not been as much a part of the Canadian heritage as fearless Mounties and scarlet maple leaves?

Yet that modest little station in Hope was not just another small town railway station. This was the first station on the Kettle Valley Railway. It is not known why that fact should be of any significance he
