ABSTRACT

Natural resource depletion and the effects of global warming on the environment have emerged as urgent worldwide challenges. Many countries have responded by implementing plans to manage their natural resources and deal with environmental issues in the post-COVID-19 era. However, innovative abilities are frequently limited in low-income countries (LICs), which makes it difficult for them to successfully offset environmental consequences. It is crucial to comprehend the possible contributions that innovation, tourism, and the availability of natural resources can make to resolving these issues. This study focuses on examining how innovation, tourism, and environmental degradation relate to LICs' richness of natural resources. To establish the reliability of the results, empirical analysis utilizing data from 2000 to 2020 of LICs was carried out using the Feasible GLS, Prais-Winsten Regression, Driscoll-Kraay standard error regression, and Non-Parametric Kernel regression models. The findings show that natural resources have a beneficial effect on environmental degradation in LICs. Natural resource-dependent sectors are thought to use energy-intensive procedures, which contribute to greater emissions, in countries where the share of natural resource rent in GDP is higher. Higher levels of innovation may not always result in environmental sustainability in LICs, as the study also demonstrates a positive association between innovation and environmental degradation. Although there is a link between tourism and environmental deterioration, it is possible that the growth of tourism in LICs will encourage the transition to a less carbon-intensive service-based economy.

1. Introduction

In the post Covid-19 era, the management of natural resources and the environment has become increasingly significant as countries realize the mutual dependence of human health, the stability of ecosystems, and economic performance (Sun et al., 2021; Zhang et al., 2022). The Covid-19 pandemic highlighted the significance of adaptation and resilience in natural resource and environmental management. Governments, organizations, and communities are incorporating sustainability and conservation measures into their policies and practices to increase their resilience to future events, such as climate change impacts (Munzir et al., 2021). Numerous nations are adopting the concept of a "green recovery" in response to the pandemic, which prioritizes sustainable development and low-carbon, nature-positive economies (Huang et al., 2020). Investments are being made in energy efficiency, renewable energy, sustainable agriculture, and nature-based solutions, thereby creating opportunities for economic growth and job creation while reducing environmental impacts (Appolloni et al., 2022; Galanakis et al., 2022). The problem caused by COVID-19 has called attention to the significance of preserving biodiversity and hazards linked with the deterioration of ecosystems. Moreover, the pandemic has revealed vulnerabilities in global supply chains, prompting a shift toward circular economy strategies (Cherrafi et al., 2022). Emphasis is placed on reducing waste production, encouraging recycling and repurposing materials, and minimizing resource extraction. This transition may result in increased resource efficacy, decreased pollution, and enhanced environmental sustainability (Litvinenko et al., 2022). The pandemic expedited the incorporation of digital technologies and the introduction of innovative practices across a variety of industries. In the context of the management of natural resources, technological advancements like remote sensing, artificial intelligence, and blockchain have the potential to play an important part in the monitoring and management of resources, the improvement of transparency, and the facilitation of sustainable practices (Cherrafi et al., 2022; Rijsewijk et al.,
