The respiratory tract is a system of branched tubes that supply air to the lung. The length and width of the tract decreases as we approach the alveoli but the total cross sectional area increases. The cross sectional area of the trachea is 2.5cm^2 but that of alveolar ducts is around 11800cm^2 .

Structurally, the tract can be classified into two:

- Upper respiratory tract leading from nose and mouth to the trachea and
- Lower respiratory from trachea to the alveolar duct

The trachea divides into two primary bronchia at the carina. The eparterial and hyparterial bronchus in the right and left primary bronchus. The right primary bronchus divides into three secondary bronchi (or lobar bronchi) with each secondary bronchi supplying air to each lobe of the lobe. The left primary bronchus divides into two lobar bronchi with each left lobar bronchi supplying each lobe. The right lobar bronchi divides into ten tertiary or segmental bronchi with each right segmental bronchi supplying air to each right bronchopulmonary segments. The left lobar bronchi divides into 8 segmental bronchi with each left segmental bronchi supplying each left bronchopulmonary segments. The right and left bronchopulmonary segments further branch into terminal bronchioles when diameter is less or equal to 1mm . Terminal bronchioles divide and form respiratory bronchioles when the length is less or equal to 0.5mm . The respiratory bronchioles and alveolar ducts supply alveoli with air. There are over 300 million alveoli in the lung. Alveoli are the functional units of gaseous exchange.

The following are important characteristics of airway

- Epithelial cells: The epithelial cells of the respiratory tract are predominantly pseudostratified squamous epithelial cells. They are also characterized by projections called cilia. Mucociliary action is an important innate and acquired immune defense in the body. It reproofs impurities (eg dust) that may be contained in air. It is also an integral process of allergy.
