

Matthew Arnold's "Culture and Anarchy"

A lot of introductions to literary studies, including the one provided by Nünning , concentrate on what Collini (2000)² calls the "Holy Trinity" of literary studies: poem, drama and novel. According to Collini, this view dominated the Anglo-American literary study from the 1930's to at least the early 1970's. He states "Under this regime, the recalcitrant mixed-mode texts of the Victorian essayist and moralists did not fare well".

Nevertheless, non-fictional types of texts are the most common in everyday life. Were would humanity be without newspapers, manuals, hypertexts, and all the other pieces of "non-fictional prose" which are, according to Collini "a nearly limitless category"?

It is the the most red category, and the category most written in. Writers are mostly engaged in non-fictional prose. There are millions of journalists and scientists today; not to speak of all the bureaucrats in the administrations of nearly every enterprise or government, who write trillions of letters, reports and presentations every day. Non-fictional prose is worth more attention.

This paper is concerned with a piece of non-fictional prose. Culture and Anarchy by Matthew Arnold. In order to deliver a sufficient analysis, there will be a chapter on the author first, to get an impression of how to understand the utterances. This includes a brief summary of the most important texts that were published by Matthew Arnold before Culture and Anarchy. Afterwards, there will be a chapter on text types, to clarify which category of text the work belongs to. At last, there will be the analysis of, as an application of the theory from the chapter before, with respect to the current scientific state of interpretation of Culture and Anarchy.
