

transformation.”<sup>17</sup> As ‘curriculum’, which concerns the education for ministry and faith in classroom, congregation and community, and which should facilitate a multidirectional dialogue between Biblical, historical, systematic theology and ‘practical theology and practices of ministry and faith’.<sup>18</sup> And, finally and more conventionally, as ‘discipline’ where Miller-McLemore argues for the Practical Theology’s life ‘beyond the academy’. ‘Practical theology is more than a method [...] or a curricular area’, she writes. Her insistence on the life of the faithful within the community brings her paradigm full circle to its starting premise: ‘practical theology’s importance rests on its value for, or its relationship to, the life of everyday faith.’<sup>19</sup>

A similar attempt to push practical theology beyond the sphere of the academe and closer to the life of the faithful appears in Peter Ward’s introduction to Perspectives on Ecclesiology and Ethnography. The author decries a certain avoidance by theologians of ‘field work’, and argues for the need for ‘empirical research’. This empirical component has often been referred to as ‘ethnography’, and it ‘has often been discussed by theologians as [...] a theoretical and theological necessity, but strangely this is very often divorced from any real or sustained engagement with actual churches and communities.’<sup>20</sup>

Where Ward comes perhaps closer to an Orthodox view on practical theology is his bringing together of theology and sociology into an organic whole: ‘to understand the Church, we should view it as being simultaneously theological and social/cultural.’<sup>21</sup> ‘To do ecclesiology’, he writes, ‘we must embrace methods of research that are simultaneously theological and “ethnographic”’, methods which ‘arise from our situatedness as church.’<sup>22</sup> Thus, if theology is to be ‘reshaped by observation’, observation remains a theological endeavour even if the tools employed are those of social and cultural enquiry. Ward’s vision has a Christological foundation, as he quotes Colossians 1 where Christ is described as the One in whom all things originate and are reconciled – ‘in Him all things are held together’ – while at the same time being the ‘head of His body, the Church.’<sup>23</sup>

It is this eminently theological drive, as well as the emphasis on ‘human gestures to the transcendent’ which inform the perspective of a number of modern Orthodox theologians on pastoral theology and its ultimate goal – while remaining seemingly less concerned with methodological analyses and models. Orthodox academic John Allison demarcates two essential constituent elements of an Orthodox Pastoral theology:

‘While there is much common ground in pastoral theology, what is distinctive vis-à-vis other Western Christian traditions [...] are the particular tools and experience of the Orthodox Church. Two areas in particular are emphasized in the Orthodox tradition of pastoral theology: liturgical life (where two or three are gathered’, Mt. 18:20) and the inner life (go into your room and shut the door’, Mt. 6:6). The one reinforces the other [...]’<sup>24</sup>

The areas of liturgical life and inner life are emphasized here as foci of Orthodox pastoral theology, and this represents indeed a very realistic approach to the Orthodox view. When talking about pastoral theology or care, the Orthodox faithful will immediately make reference to their life in the Church and to praying for each other. For a Westerner this would likely seem unconvincing, as what looks at first sight simply as attendance of Church services and praying for one another does little in
