

Variable Star Photoelectric Photometry Data Logging by Computer: Notes of a Fledgling Photometrist

Frank Dempsey

*1152 Tanzer Court, Pickering, Ontario, Canada L1W 3S6, E-mail:
 fjd@idirect.com*

1. Introduction

This poster paper describes some details of the adventure of successfully interfacing a photoelectric photometer to a computer through the software package 'ACQ' (Jones, 1991) in what shouldn't normally be an adventure, but should simply work when connected.

2. Description of Project

The purpose of this project is to connect and use a computer to log the data from a photoelectric photometer used for measuring variable star magnitudes, in a location where lack of electrical power does not normally allow use of a computer.

2.1. Description of Astronomical Photoelectric Photometry at Ishpiming Observatory

An Optec SSP-3 photoelectric photometer is used on the author's 20cm Newtonian telescope to photoelectrically measure magnitudes of variable stars at Ishpiming Observatory near Pickering, Ontario. ('Ishpiming' is a native Ojibwe word meaning "the sky above".) Variable stars observed photoelectrically are chosen from the AAVSO (American Association of Variable Star Observers) program of stars needing photoelectric observations. Some examples of AAVSO program stars monitored at Ishpiming Observatory are: V509 Cas, RS Cnc, EW Lac, V614 Mon, X Per, and VW UMa.

2.2. The Need for Computer

Without computerized data logging, data can most easily be recorded in the dark by verbally speaking the photometer output numbers into a tape voice recorder (or else by writing onto paper) and then later manually keying the numbers into spreadsheet software, analyzing the data for mistakes and observational error (standard deviation in the resulting magnitude difference) and then keying more numbers into specific AAVSO software for reporting observations. For each observation set (for 1 variable star), the typical number of digits keyed in manually was about 510.
