

inspiring from the text and the striking illustrations a historical-social-anthropological perspective on change in Southern Africa. Even experts will learn a little, questions will be raised and connections suggested, and most will enjoy it.

JAMES COBBE, Florida State University

The Political Economy of Nasserism: A Study in Employment and Income Distribution Policies in Urban Egypt, 1952-72. By Mahmoud Abdel-Fadil. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1980. Pp. xii, 140. $24.95 cloth, $13.95 paper.

The "Nasserist Revolution" of 1952-1961 consisted of two successive thrusts: an agrarian reform and the nationalization of all large-scale industry, banking, transport, and insurance. Mahmoud Abdel-Fadil covered the first in his excellent Development, Income Distribution and Social Change in Rural Egypt (1952-70), published in 1975. The present work deals, somewhat less successfully, with some of the consequences of the second change. True to form, Cambridge has set an exorbitant price; no wonder the photocopying industry is flourishing.

Between 1960 and 1970 employment in Egypt rose by 2,268,000 or 33 percent. Of these, 800,000 found jobs in agriculture and the rest in the urban sector—300,000 in manufacturing and mining and the balance in other activities. Chapters 1 and 2 discuss the structure of employment in the urban sector; their most interesting finding is that in 1970 government employment (excluding defense and production workers in nationalized industries) totaled 1,300,000 out of a non-agricultural labor force of 4,200,000. The informal urban sector, with its usual features of underemployment and disguised unemployment, is discussed only briefly, for lack of data.

Wage regulation, trends, and differentials are analyzed in the following chapter. Between 1950 and 1965 real wages rose by about one-half, but from then to 1970 the sharp rise in prices fully offset increases in money wages. As in other developing areas, wage differentials are wide. Skilled workers received considerably more than unskilled; those in "modern organized industries" earn nearly three times as much as those in "small scale industry"; and within the modern manufacturing sector some industries (for example, oil) pay for labor two and a half times as much as some others (such as wood, food, furniture, paper). The gap between white collar and blue collar earnings is, however, narrowing: from 3.2:1 in 1961 to 2.3:1 in 1966. This is attributed to two forces: "First, industrialization may have increased the demand for certain categories of skilled labour, thus bidding up their wages. Secondly, the employment drive of the early 1960s may have swelled the numbers of white-collar employees, especially in the lower ranks (i.e., relatively low-paid clerks)" (p. 45). Two further factors may be suggested: the expansion in education and the exodus of foreigners and minority groups, who had formed a significant portion of and set salary levels in white-collar occupations.

Distribution of personal income and consumption are discussed in Chapter 4. The results are paradoxical: the Gini coefficient for government service declined from 0.368 in 1952 to the relatively low figure of 0.34 in 1972; yet the salary of "a top government official" is 40 times the per capita national average, compared to ten in Japan and eight in the United States. Urban income disparities still seem great, but unreliability of data makes closer analysis difficult. There seems no doubt, however, that thanks to large-scale foreign aid, both lower and middle-upper class consumption rose considerably in the 1960s (see tables, pp. 66-67).

Examination of the tax structure (Chapter 5) shows it to be "inadequate in terms of both equity in taxation and administrative capacity" (p. 88). The social composition of urban society is studied in Chapter 6 and a "Class Map," with estimated numbers, is given (p. 95). The final chapter evaluates the limits of Nasserism, in terms of the nature of the
