Abstract

Political opposition has long been one of the most dramatically understudied elements of real-world politics in contemporary democratic and authoritarian regimes. The past decade or so has, however, witnessed an upsurge of new opposition research that begs for a major state-of-the-field review. Interestingly, recent scholarship has focused more on manifestations of opposition in authoritarian and hybrid than in democratic systems, which indicates a latent reconceptualization of political opposition (setting aside older distinctions between regime-loyal opposition and regime-challenging forms of resistance, dissidence and contestation). With a focus on party-based forms of opposition, which have been widely considered to mark the most effective form of opposition, this review article takes stock and highlights key issues for future research as well as some inherent obstacles to the emergence of a more integrated field of cross-regime opposition studies.

Keywords: democracies; electoral autocracies; institutions; strategies; opposition leaders; opposition parties

For all the passionate commitment of contemporary democratic theory to considering political opposition a quintessential element of democracy, there is an inherent bias in both politics and the study of politics towards government, or more specifically the political executive, at the expense of political oppositions.¹ This is true for most of the past (spanning the long centuries of the pre-democratic age with its often spectacular manifestations of largely unfettered executive power), but barely less so for the present. Various dynamics have come to advance an executive-centred view of politics, and executive-centred research agendas in political science. Personalization, internationalization (including the rise of international summitry), an increased demand for centralized coordination at the core executive, as well as protracted political, economic and other crises (including the coronavirus pandemic) all have worked to focus public and scholarly attention increasingly onto the political executive, rather than its challengers (Andeweg et al. 2020).²
