Understanding Indian Land
Cessions in the Western United States

Indian land cessions in the Western United States have been a complex process, involving numerous treaties and agreements between the federal government and various tribes. The process has resulted in the loss of vast amounts of land to the federal government, which has since been used for a variety of purposes, including agriculture, industry, and conservation. The process has also resulted in the displacement of many tribes from their traditional lands, leading to significant social and economic challenges for many tribes today.
