KEYWORDS: Schistosomiasis, Schistosoma haematobium, Urologic diseases, Urography

Clinical Picture

As described in Genitourinary Schistosomiasis (Bilharziasis) Part 1, the life of the Schistosoma haematobium begins in stagnant waters where the parasite lays its eggs. During the warm hours of the day the egg swells, ruptures, and releases a miracidium which then penetrates a specific species of snail, the Bulinus. Having penetrated the snail, it becomes a sporocyst and, by repeated budding, gives rise to a second generation of daughter sporocysts. Cercariae by the thousands are produced by the sporocysts and liberated from the snails. Unless these free-swimming cercariae can penetrate the skin or mucous membrane of a human host within seven days, they will die.

Irritative dermatitis may result around the area of the cercariae's penetration.¹ An example is swimmer's itch, a maculourticarial dermatitis which may become papular or even pustular.

The incubation period is difficult to determine, but symptoms may arise from two months to over two years after infection. In the early stages there is often slight fever with general weakness and prostration. A more typical symptom is terminal hematuria. Lower urinary tract symptoms may include scalding upon urination, frequency, and urgency. Urinalysis may confirm the presence of red blood cells as well as the characteristic ova with terminal spines.

Bacterial cystitis and renal stone formation may further aggravate and modify the symptoms. If fibrosis and calcification develop, the bladder may contract, hypertrophy, or dilate. If there is outlet obstruction, pain may be absent although sometimes a dull ache or sense of oppression is noticeable in the suprapubic or perineal region.

If the ureters and kidneys become involved, upper tract symptoms may become manifest. Rectal symptoms, with passage of blood and mucus, may also be present.

In the early stages of bilharzial ureteritis, hematuria and ureteral colics are present with ureteral obstruction resulting in hydronephrosis. Sometimes, one, large, palpable kidney is present. If bacterial infection occurs, pyonephrosis with its manifestations develop. Renal stone formation may complicate the picture by aggravating the obstruction and adding an acute element to the already subacute or chronic obstruction. If the obstruction is bilateral, symptoms of renal insufficiency may become apparent. In fact, in N. Makar's experience, bilharziasis of the ureter is unilateral in only 20 percent of the cases.²

Lesions in the male genital system or the urethra are common with Schistosoma haematobium infestation. Urethral strictures and urinary fistulas may form. The penile sheath swells and urinary obstruction and/or impotence may occur. The spermatic cord, epididymis, prostate, and seminal vesicles may also become involved. In the acute stage, hemospermia occurs. Obstructive symptoms may also be present in the acute stage. In the chronic stage, fibrosis leads to urinary outflow obstructive symptoms.

The female genitalia, particularly the cervix and fallopian tubes, as well as the vagina, vulva, and ovaries may become involved with obstructive sequelae. The female urethra may be the site of thickening, or papillomas may emerge from the external meatus. Periurethral abscesses may form and papillomas or ulcers may develop on the vulva or around the anus and groin. Diagnosis depends upon finding ova in these tissues.

Anemia is common and may be partly due to loss of blood in the urine. Hypersplenism may also be a major factor in anemia. A nephrotic syndrome secondary to an immune reaction may also occur.

The symptoms present differently in patients of different racial groups. Those of European extraction often have prominent allergic manifestations with tiredness. Patients of African origin have greater output of the parasite's ova and manifest severe local lesions with dysuria, hematuria, and abdominal pain.

The Katayama syndrome sometimes occurs in new arrivals to an endemic area when they are infested with
