

"This way!" Shay cried, her voice barely audible in all the commotion.

Tally turned and picked up the rifle.

"Don't touch me!" she yelled. "I'll save me if you just get away from me!"

She paused, then saw that the two prayer machines were hovering protectively over her.

Tally dashed across the room, not knowing if the door was about to collapse or if she was being followed.

She picked up the rifle to protect a growing wall of smoke. "We can get through here. Then pass the machine. We have to reach outside sooner or later, right?"

"Right . . .," Tally said. "But what thing crushes us?"

The farming machine was struggling free of its parking space. As they watched, the machine next to it started up.

It rolled out of its way, and the machine tangled itself and began to roll toward them.

Shay looked back at the machine. "It's not big enough!"

The hole was too small. They now, its silver edges glowing with heat. She saw something from one of her sneak suits. "It's not big enough."

"Duck!"

"What was that?" Tally asked, crouching down.

"An old grenade. I hope it's still—"

A flash of light and a deafening roar came through the door.

Come on!
