

Mediterranean Type Ecosystems (MTEs): a brief introduction

Mediterranean type ecosystems (MTEs) of the world have a rather wide distribution (Fig. 1), since they extend over (i) the 17 circa Mediterranean countries (European, African and Middle East), (ii) the southern parts of the states of South Australia, Victoria, and Western Australia, (iii) all of the U.S. state of California, excluding desert and steppe, reaching into small parts of the state of Oregon and the Mexican state of Baja California, (iv) the middle third of central Chile in South America, and (v) limited to a small area of coastal the Western Cape and Eastern Cape provinces in South Africa (Trzcyna 2004). The circa-Mediterranean areas amount to 1.4 million km² with around half (693,000 km²) found on the European side.

MTEs are characterized by a particular ecological setting that supports an exceptionally rich life in terms of flora and fauna and, as historically proven, offer exemplary conditions for humans to display their creative power in building what is called modern western civilization. Climate is the dominant feature of the Mediterranean areas. It is characterized by the interchange of a rainy season in the cold months with a dry season in the warm months. However it is the stochastic spatial and temporal variation of the climatic pattern (mostly in terms of rainfall and air temperature) that underpins this climate uniqueness. Another peculiarity of Mediterranean areas is related to topography and soils. Topographic variations include limited flat plains, but numerous elevated plateaux, hills and mountains, thus resulting in a very rugged and highly dissected landscape. Soils are mostly derived from calcareous formations. Based on the FAO's World Reference Base for Soil Resources the dominant Mediterranean soil groups are leptosols (typically mountainous soils where soil formation is counteracted by denudation), regosols (commonly found in eroded landscapes), cambisols (widespread across the Mediterranean in soils with a cambic horizon appearing in erosion deposits), and others like luvisols (soils with argic, white clay, horizon), nitroisols (with high iron content, not too vulnerable to erosion), vertisols (in low-lying, level, landscape positions with characteristic alternating wet-dry conditions), gypsisols (common in the drier eastern Mediterranean parts of Turkey, Syria and north Africa, suitable for extensive livestock grazing), and calcisols (where calcium carbonate is present in the soil) (Spaargaren 2006). Characteristic climatic and soil variations are the sources of supporting the rich flora (and fauna) met in Mediterranean areas. It is estimated that the Basin hosts approximately 11,700 endemic plant species, which is more than four times the number found in all the rest of Europe, and often comprise up to 40% of plant species lists (Guccione 2000). Although MTEs cover only about 2.25% of the Earth's land area, they contain 20% of its named
