Abstract

Feixtrizer (2011) stated that 84% of the teaching population in the U. S. is white, monolingual women who lack the multicultural knowledge and experiences needed to teach our increasingly diverse students. The authors aim to support teachers in the development of culturally responsive instruction, regardless of their cultural background, by describing culturally sensitive approaches to their instruction. They also provide several examples of multicultural and international literature and discuss ways that it can be used to help students develop cultural competence.

Through globalization and migration, our society has become much more multicultural. People meet new faces in study, work, and business; people communicate with people from other cultures face-to-face or virtually in their native language or their learned languages; people have more access today to printed or virtual materials from other cultures. Literacy teachers who work with both English speakers and English language learners (ELLs) must develop an
