Abstract

Reading comprehension is one of the most complex cognitive activities in which humans engage, making it difficult to teach, measure, and research. Despite decades of research in reading comprehension, international and national reading scores indicate stagnant growth for U.S. adolescents. In this article, we review the theoretical and empirical research in reading comprehension. We first explore different theoretical models for comprehension and then focus on components shown to be important across models that represent potential targets for instruction. In the last part of the article, we consider solutions for translating research to practice and policies for improving instruction. Improving reading scores will require a concerted and collaborative effort by researchers, educators, and policy makers with a focus on long-term solutions. An early and sustained focus on developing background knowledge, vocabulary, inference, and comprehension monitoring skills across development will be necessary to improve comprehension.

To increase reading comprehension, educators will need to provide early and sustained instruction in knowledge, vocabulary, inference generation, and comprehension monitoring.

Key Points

- Improving adolescent reading comprehension will require a concerted effort from researchers, educators, and policy makers to forgo short-term gains on measures that tap low-level comprehension for long-term solutions that take years to develop.
- An early and sustained focus on developing background knowledge, vocabulary, inference, and comprehension monitoring skills is necessary to improve reading comprehension across grade levels.
- Despite decades of reading comprehension research, a limited amount of time is spent using evidence-based methods in classrooms.
- Education leaders will need to strengthen teacher preparation programs and professional development to ensure teachers are prepared to use evidence-based practices to meet the literacy needs of their students.

Introduction

According to national and international tests of literacy, such as the Program for International Student Assessment (PISA) and National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP), students in the United States are unable to do relatively easy literacy tasks such as locate relevant information to determine the main idea of a text or make simple inferences (Kastberg, Chan, & Murray, 2016; National Center for Education Statistics, 2017). According to the most recent PISA, U.S. adolescents rank 15th in literacy skills. Results showed that 19% of the 15-year-olds tested scored below a Level 2 (of 6) indicating they had difficulty with tasks such as locating explicitly stated information, recognizing main ideas, and making low-level inferences in a familiar topic. Only 10% of U.S. students achieved a Level 3 indicating that they could organize several pieces of deeply embedded information, and engage in reflective, evaluative, and interpretative tasks in unfamiliar topics. Similarly, the NAEP scores showed that 64% of eighth grade students read at or below a basic level. Unfortunately, these scores have remained relatively flat for many years and have led many educators, researchers, and policy makers to question how well students are being prepared for a job market that increasingly requires self-learning, analytical skills, and transferable knowledge (e.g., Goldman & Pellegrino, 2015).
