

Sex, Sensibility and Sociability: Illustrating Marivaux's La Vie de Marianne in the Eighteenth Century*

ANN LEWIS

Very little critical work has been devoted to the illustrations to Marivaux's La Vie de Marianne, and, to date, there is no comprehensive study of its numerous illustrated editions. This is surprising given the eighteenth-century popularity of the novel (in both France and England),<sup>2</sup> and the rapidity with which illustrated editions appeared (the Dutch publisher Néaulme started including illustrations as early as 1736, even as Marivaux was still writing later instalments of the text). It is also surprising given the considerable critical interest in the illustrations to works such as Prévost's Manon Lescaut and Rousseau's Julie, and, indeed, the increasing interest in the question of eighteenth-century novel illustration in general, in recent years.<sup>3</sup> This neglect may in part be explained by the fact that critics have found no evidence to suggest that Marivaux was directly involved in the commission or direction of the images although he may have had the possibility of illustration in mind.<sup>4</sup> Unlike those of Gravelot for Julie, therefore, the images can not be considered 'an intrinsic part of the narrative', to use Nicholas Cronk's recent phrase.<sup>5</sup>

However, from the perspective of reception, different illustrated editions that are not controlled by the author provide a particularly interesting form of evidence of how a novel's themes are perceived at the different moments of its successive publication. Illustrations, like the material books within which they appear, mediate between the author's text and its readers. The selection of episodes for illustration and the manner of representing them both engage with the reader's expectations and aesthetic preferences, and, by differently configuring the material book, condition their reading experience. As Genette remarks more generally, in relation to the paratexte and its function vis-à-vis the 'text proper': 'elles [ces productions] l'entourent et le prolongent pour le présenter [...] pour le rendre présent, pour assurer sa présence au monde, sa "réception" et sa consommation, sous la forme, aujourd'hui au moins, d'un livre'<sup>6</sup> ('[These paratextual elements] surround and extend the text, in order to present it, [...] make it present, to ensure the text's presence in the world, its 'reception' and its consumption in the form (nowadays, at least) of a book').

In the case of La Vie de Marianne, which explores contemporary social values, different forms of sociability, and especially the functioning of high society, the vector of its 'presentation' to different groups of readers (at
