

The Q Drum originated in response to the needs of rural people in South Africa.

A South African engineer, Piet Hendriks, came up with a solution to the problem of carrying water: the Q Drum. The Q Drum stores 13 gallons (about 50 liters) of water in a rolling container. Made of strong plastic material, it can roll over any kind of ground, no matter how rough. Anyone—even young children—can easily pull the drum with an attached rope. With this innovation, people in developing countries can carry more clean water per journey with less effort.

HEALTH DETECTOR

In many developing countries, doctors work with no electricity or clean water. They have to send medical tests to labs² and wait weeks for results. Patients may die while waiting to receive treatment. But a little piece of paper developed by Saudi Arabian scientist Hayat Sindi could change that.

Sindi's device is only the size of a postage stamp, but it can help identify health problems. It contains tiny holes that are filled with chemicals. When a person places a single drop of blood on the paper, the chemicals react to the blood and cause the paper to change color. This indicates whether or not the person has an illness. Doctors can then take action immediately, saving time and lives. Since the health detector is made of paper, it's very light and easy to carry. Health workers can easily bring it with them to perform tests in patients' homes. Best of all, this can be done at a very low cost. No electricity, water, or special equipment is needed to use the device. Sindi explains, "It's a tool that allows even the poorest people in the most medically challenged places to get the tests they need."

²Labs are laboratories—places where scientific research is done.

Hayat Sindi presents her invention at a 2009 conference.
