

WORK WITH THE READING

- ➊ A. Read the article and gather information about how important it is to write by hand.

Two Styles of Writing

a child learning to write

- 1 What does it mean to learn a language? Of course, we need to produce the sounds that make up words, put words together into meaningful units, and understand others who speak to us. To be literate, we also need to read and write. We should be able to write the letters of the alphabet, but with all the other parts of the language that need to be practiced, is it important to learn two ways to write them?
- 2 Educators have long seen the connection between learning to read and learning to write the letters that make up words. In one study, adults who learned to write a new alphabet with paper and pencil were better able to recognize and remember letters than their counterparts, who only studied the printed letters but did not try to form them. In addition, children develop fine motor skills and control when learning to write by hand. They must pay attention to the shape of the letters, for example, in order to produce a "d" that is distinct from a "b." Likewise, they must judge how much pressure to apply so as to avoid poking holes in the paper or accidentally tearing it. They must learn to move their hands and not smudge their work while writing. Also, they need to keep the words in a straight line and pay attention to how the letters are placed with respect to one another. For example, the stem of a "b" rises, while the stem of a "p" falls.

- 3 Educators also employ tactile¹ and kinesthetic² methods to help young children learn to form their letters. Children may trace letters on sandpaper to stimulate nerve endings in their fingers. Similarly, they may use their whole arm and shoulder to write giant letters in the sand or on big pieces of paper. Using these large muscle groups helps to establish important nerve connections between the muscles and the brain.
- 4 With so many subjects competing for attention, some parents and teachers have raised questions about how worthwhile it is to teach children both to print, to form letters in much the same way as they are seen in books, and to write in cursive, a kind of writing that connects the letters of a word together. Is it worth the time spent on learning both forms, or is it enough to learn just to print, leaving more time for other subjects, such as reading or computer skills?

² kinesthetic: related to motion
