

Crime And Punishment

During the Anglo-Saxon period, there was no police force and there were no prisons. However, that does not mean that people could do as they liked. Far from it! There were strict laws which were passed down from the king. However, it was the community who made sure people followed the rules. For example, if someone called for help because he was being robbed, he would raise a 'hue and cry'. Anyone who heard it had to come to help. There were other ways of making sure people behaved honestly. All men over the age of 12 belonged to a tithing. A tithing was a group of ten men. They were all responsible for each other. If one of the ten committed a crime, the other nine had to bring him to the court for justice. If they did not, they would all be held guilty!

The most common crime in the Anglo-Saxon times was theft. Murder was, as you might expect, against the law. Other crimes were those which challenged the authority of the nobles or kings. As England became a Christian country, the law also upheld Christian morals.

The Anglo-Saxons used a jury system. A jury is a group of people who listen to both sides of the story. Then they decide if the person was innocent or guilty. However, unlike today, the Anglo-Saxon jury would be people who knew both sides. They would also use their knowledge of the person's character when deciding if he or she was guilty.

Sometimes the jury could not reach a verdict. In those cases, the Anglo-Saxons turned to 'trial by ordeal'. The accused would be subjected to an ordeal. It could be picking up a hot iron, walking on hot coals, putting their hand in boiling water or being tied up and thrown into an ice-cold river. If the accused survived and their wounds healed, it was a sign that God was judging them as innocent. If not, they were guilty!

Next, the punishment was decided. At the start of the Anglo-Saxon era, people were allowed to take revenge. For example, it was acceptable to kill someone who had killed your own relative. However, by the end of the Anglo-Saxon times, there were other systems in place. Most crimes were punished with a fine. This system was called Weregild. Different crimes came with different fines. Some of those rules might seem a bit unfair today. For
