Several of the papers in this volume were first presented at an associate section meeting of the ASA IV Decennial Conference, 'The Uses of Knowledge: global and local relations', held in Oxford during July 1995. We are grateful to the conference convenor, Marilyn Strathern, and the local co-ordinator, Wendy James, for inviting us to organise a session on visual representation and visual knowledge.

Since then many people have helped us bring this volume into being. In particular, we would like to thank Ian Dunlop, Francis Morphy and all the contributors for reading our introduction and for their constructive comments. We also wish to thank Patsy Asch, Gillian Crowther, Françoise Dussart, Elizabeth Edwards, Malcolm Osman, Gwll Owen and Alison Petch for their practical help with the illustrations for the introduction, and Catherine Basson, Hitachi Ltd, Kim MacKenzie, the New York Academy of Sciences, Oxford University Press, Unichrome Ltd, and Giles Walker of Lowe Howard Spink for providing a number of the illustrations.

More generally we are grateful to a number of friends and colleagues who provided advice, help and support along the way, particularly Francis Morphy and Barrie Thomas. Robert Baldoock at Yale University Press was encouraging from the outset, and Candida Beard coped cheerfully with an increasingly complicated manuscript. Finally, our home

However, visual anthropology has suffered as much as any other branch of anthropology from what in other contexts is one of the great virtues of the discipline: the breadth of its agenda and the reluctance to leave any aspect of the study of humans outside its orbit. The interdisciplinary nature of anthropology means that there is a constant tension between centrifugal and centripetal forces. This is manifest in a continual budding-off process resulting in a plethora of sub-disciplines which can always pose a threat to the coherence of the centre. Historically anthropology has been riven by debates as to whether what someone else does is really anthropology. Yet if the centre is an uncomfortable place to be, it is precisely this reference back to the centre, to some more general concept of the discipline, that gives coherence to anthropology: it is this that makes social anthropology different from sociology and biological anthropology, different from human genetics or human physiology. Visual anthropology is itself an
