of the hoopoes: further north I actually saw hoopoes at the end of March and they may sometimes be seen in Shanghai from the middle of March onwards, though I see them more often about the middle of April. Somewhat larger than a thrush with buff coloured plumage and black and white wings rather like those of a pied woodpecker, they are an unforgettable sight as they open and shut their great cinnamon crest like a fan: a pair of these came into my garden the other day, and a little later settled on the bird-table, but merely to rest and not to feed. A little later came a blue and white flycatcher, one of the most brilliant birds imaginable, the shades of blue ranging from that of a kingfisher to a deep ultramarine, with a white breast and black bib below to set off the colour of the upper-parts.

This has happened to me so often that I am wondering what the true explanation can be: is this (a) a trick of the blackbird's memory which tells him that the orioles will soon be here, or (b) mere

LATE APRIL

Now in the middle of April the panorama of the countryside moves with, so that even a few days' absence is sufficient to guarantee a complete change on returning to the scene of one's daily observation. The leaves of the trees are bursting rapidly into full foliage and encouraging the male and more timid birds to think of building nests: now you may see a few hawfinches flying round with building material in their bills, but whether they are doing so seriously with the intention of building is not yet quite clear. On fine spring mornings such as these the bullbats seem determined to bounce through the air, singing as they go: they may not yet be building now, but springtime is upon them.

Just at this time some of our most brilliant migrants are to be seen, and I would here like to make particular mention
