The oral cavity and its bony components (maxilla and mandible), along with the nose and its related sinuses, constitute most of the face. Because of their proximity, disease in one may affect the other, whereas trauma of the midface will involve bones common to the oral cavity, nose, and paranasal sinuses. The two serve important life-supporting functions, being the portals for nutrition and respiration. The nasal cavity receives air and conditions the air that is passed on to the other areas of the respiratory tract. The paranasal sinuses are pneumatic cavities lined by mucous membrane and communicate directly with the nasal cavity. The paranasal sinuses are the frontal sinus, ethmoid cells, maxillary sinus, and sphenoid sinus. This article presents a brief but relevant view of the surgical anatomy of the nasal cavity and paranasal sinuses that will be germane to the topics discussed in other articles elsewhere in this issue.

THE NASAL CAVITY

The nasal cavities are located in the middle of the face between the frontal sinus above, the oral cavity below, and the orbits and maxillary sinuses to the sides (Figs. 1 and 2). The nasal cavity is encased in a pyramidal-shaped osseo-cartilaginous framework and is divided into two compartments by the nasal septum. The osseous portion consists of two nasal bones that articulate with the nasal process of the frontal bone superiorly and fuses with the maxilla laterally. Their lower borders are beveled on their inner surfaces where they articulate with the upper lateral nasal cartilages. The upper lateral nasal cartilages project up below the nasal bones and are attached to them with dense connective tissue.

The cartilaginous portion of the framework consists of two components: the upper lateral and lower lateral nasal cartilages.

Upper Lateral Nasal Cartilages

The upper lateral nasal cartilage is roughly triangular-shaped. Its superior edge is thin and articulates with the nasal bones via dense connective tissue and fuses to the maxilla. The inferior border is also thin and inserts below the border of the lower lateral cartilage (this is not always a consistent relationship, however).¹ This inferior end is free and is the site of the intercartilaginous incision during rhinoplasty. The medial border is thick and continuous with the septal cartilage.
