

Beauvoir's self-representation, which is significant given the sheer volume of her autobiographical work. Nor does Fraser take into account that Beauvoir's philosophy and fiction also find sexuality and the erotic central to human experience. In fact, much recent Beauvoir scholarship which Fraser does not discuss addresses sexuality and the erotic in Beauvoir's work. If Fraser discussed Beauvoir's views on sexuality and lived experience, she would have to then discuss the thorny problem of the interplay between self-representation, theory, and scholarship. I think such a discussion would not only be fruitful but is necessary to Fraser's project. Beauvoir scholars are responding to Beauvoir when they say that she did not value her relationships equally. I think some of Fraser's lack of generosity toward biographers and other scholars is due to the fact that Fraser does not contextualize their work by showing how it responds to Beauvoir. I think my own confusion about what Fraser's prescriptive project is has to do with the fact that Fraser does not tell the reader how she would engage with Beauvoir.

In Identity Without Selfhood, we see Beauvoir as an icon, a photograph in a newspaper, a representation of feminism, of existentialism, of French cultural elitism. Here, Beauvoir is an icon without authorhood. What her image represents has little to do with what she wrote. Ironically, this is the problem of having one's beloved intellectual mentor turn into an icon. I believe that Fraser also thinks Beauvoir has been sold out and made into a cultural icon, and it is this icon that she wishes to examine. While I agree with Fraser that the "Beauvoir Icon" erases bisexuality or makes it incidental, I don't agree that the Beauvoir Icon is the subject of all of the authors she criticizes.

Perspectives on Equality: Constructing a Relational Theory. By CHRISTINE M. KOGGEL. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield, 1998.

Susan Hekman

The goal of Christine Koggel's book is an ambitious one: to bring the insights of relational theory to bear on liberal theory's discussion of equality and justice. Relational theory posits that the self is constituted through relationships with others and not, as in liberal/modernist theory, derived from a universal human
