The first crack of thunder made you freeze in your tracks.

You were heading back from the mess hall after the camp's annual marshmallow roast, your hoodie still smelling like smoke and sugar. But now, the air felt tight, the wind sharp, and the sky above Camp Echo had turned the color of bruised steel.

A second rumble rolled across the lake, and this time, lightning followed — not far off, but directly overhead. You looked at your best friend Anika, who had just stepped out behind you.

"Um," she said, staring upward. "That's not just a storm. That's a microburst."
