The Dead Command Vicente Blasco Ibanez, 2024-11-23 Jaime Febrer arose at nine o'clock Old Antonia the faithful servant who cherished the memory of the past glories of the family and who had attended upon Jaime from the day of his birth had been bustling about the room since eight o'clock in the hope of awakening him As the light filtering through the transom of a broad window seemed too dim she flung open the worm-eaten blinds Then she raised the gold-fringed red damask drapery which hung like an awning over the ample couch the ancient lordly and majestic couch in which many generations of Febrers had been born and in which they had died The night before on returning from the Casino Jaime had charged her most earnestly to arouse him early as he was invited to breakfast at Valldemosa Time to get up It was the finest of spring mornings in the garden birds were singing in the flowery branches swayed by the breeze that blew over the wall from the sea The old servant seeing that her master had at last decided to get out of bed retreated to the kitchen Jaime Febrer strolled about the room before the open window almost nude There was no danger of his being seen The dwelling opposite was an old palace like his own a great house with few windows From his room he could see a wall of indefinite color with deep scars and faint traces of ancient frescoes It was so near the street being extremely narrow that it seemed as if he might touch it with his hand
