Introduction to Chapter 2

In its widest application science policy is concerned with education, the stock of knowledge, its availability and use, and research and development. Technology policy is concerned with the adoption and use of techniques – innovation, diffusion of techniques and their replacement. As is indicated in Table 2.1, however, the borderline between the two policy types is not clear-cut.

Division between the areas and variables of science policy and technology policy are not watertight. Education and the stock of knowledge, for instance, play an important role in influencing the rate of innovation and diffusion of new technology. Again, all elements in the left-hand column of Table 2.1 influence those in the right-hand column and there is interdependence between variables in the left-hand column.

This chapter concentrates on the areas of science policy listed in the first column of Table 2.1 and the next chapter on technology policy reviews those areas listed in the second column. The aim is to cover these areas broadly.
