Also, these relationships often reflect the asymmetrical relationship between governments and NGOs. On the one hand, governments and non-profits have found that NGOs' interventions work best if they are well-integrated with the existing public and private sectors. Thus, governments are more successful in providing services if they integrate their efforts with existing structures and institutions, rather than attempt to build a new structure from scratch. This approach has been followed in the health sector in the Third World, where NGOs are often well integrated with the existing health system, rather than being isolated and competing with government health services.
