

liking the identity of the centrioles seen in the sperm-forming divisions with the similar ones found in other types of mitosis, including the maturation-division of the egg. This comparison has recently been challenged with the contention that in the sperm-forming divisions the centriole is only secondarily associated with the astral centers, and that it is primarily a blepharoplast for the production of the axial filament of the sperm-tail. A crucial test for this interpretation is offered by Ascaris megalocephala, where the mature sperm shows neither tail nor axial filament. It was with this point in mind that the late Professor Robert H. Bowen suggested a reinvestigation of the facts in that animal.

My preparations of the sperm-forming divisions in Ascaris megalocephala make it perfectly plain that in all essentials the behavior of the centrioles conforms exactly to the classical scheme. There can be no doubt of the fact, uniformly seen in large numbers of cells, that in the first metaphase the centrioles divide at a time when neither the surrounding centrosome nor the aster show any indication of division. In the early anaphase the centrosome becomes ellipsoidal and divides, each daughter centrosome containing a centriole. It is toward the end of the telophase stage that these daughter centrosomes, each with its centriole, begin their movement to opposite sides of the cell, never losing their identity from this stage to the prophase of the next division.

These facts can easily be demonstrated and with perfect clearness. Since in this animal the sperm has no flagellum or axial filament there is no ground for considering the centrioles as blepharoplasts or as differing in any material way from those seen in the mitosis of other kinds of cells.

These results, confirming in all essentials those of the early cytologists, are to be reported in detail hereafter.

MORE ABOUT SHIPWORMS

ON my return from the West Indies my attention was called to Dr. W. T. Calman's article, "The Taxonomic Outlook in Zoology," being the address of the president of Section D—Zoology, of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, published in SCIENCE, September 19, 1930. On page 281, Dr. Calman uses the sentence:

Dr. Bartsch, of Washington, in his "Monograph of the American Shipworms" (1922), simplified his task by the assumption that any species found on the coasts of the American continent must, of necessity, be different from any found elsewhere, and he was thus able to write "n. sp." after twenty-two out of the twenty-nine specific names. It was soon shown, however, by other American zoologists that this assumption was without foundation, and that the most destructive species on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of North America was the European Teredo navalis.

Personally this note has called for no resentment on my part, but only provoked a smile; yet some of my best friends insist that it requires a "retort courteous," lest it be deemed that silence on my part be consent.

European shipworms, unlike men, are apparently as clannish as American shipworms. American shipworms have been carried by the Gulf Stream from the West Indies to European shores since the Gulf Stream came into existence, or, probably still better, since trees grew and were set adrift in the West Indies by various agencies. These trees have always fallen a prey to shipworm attacks, and American shipworms in such floating timbers have thus paid visits to European shores since time immemorial.

Jeffreys, who has done more work upon European shipworms than any other man, pointed out long ago that in spite of the constant immigrations from American waters none of these sea waifs had succeeded in establishing themselves in European waters. By a study of the extensive Jeffreys collection, which rests in the United States National Museum, I am able to confirm his conclusions. The environmental factors of the two regions are evidently sufficiently delimiting to prevent such colonization.

Why some American authors, and my critic, persist in claiming that European shipworms are less choice in selecting a habitat than the American forms has always been a puzzle to me, and seems explainable only on three grounds: (1) European man has found America good; why shouldn't shipworms? (2) Because we love to cling to ancient concepts and are loath to change them. In the days gone by, due to little comparative material much sloppy work was done in determining shipworms and many names belonging to European species were hastily and wrongly applied to American forms. (3) The game of playing politics in science has recently crept in, it being the belief of some naturalist that if we had only one shipworm, Teredo navalis, in all the waters of the world, we could get a better or easier hearing for the forming of an international attack upon this animal. Personally, I do not see that it makes any difference whether there is one species or a thousand species of shipworms. Shipworms, except where cultivated for food, as in Siam, are like the Indians of old, all bad, and undesirable.

I find upon careful study based upon a huge amount of material that shipworms are well-behaved mollusks following the laws of distribution that dominate the other bivalves, and I see no reason or justifi-
