✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

The various readings and videos create a picture of the current and historical American society by showing how people live by imitating and trying to take advantage of each other. Social identity theory enables individuals to identify as belonging to a particular group, with some experiencing discrimination. Mimetic theory indicates that human desires result from an autonomous process even though it is a collective one; therefore, human beings want things because others like them too. Various movements in American society have been driven by a desire for change aiming to improve living conditions. American society is characterized by citizens seeking to belong to a group, imitating each other's wants, and having a desire for change.

Social identity theory connects to American society by highlighting how individuals identify with a specific group based on their background. The theory indicates that an individual's sense of who they are is based on their membership in a defined group (Lainez 0:30-1:15). Social identity theory influences how people interact and live with each other. American citizens have applied social identity theory in their lives by having a sense of belonging to a specific group by race, gender, or religious affiliation.

An individual from an insignificant group is likely to experience discrimination when trying to fit into a dominant group. This applies in the case of American citizens who come from minority racial groups trying to be like their white counterparts who form the dominant racial group. The theory is characterized by social characterization, which allows individuals to choose the group they want to belong to before determining how compatible they are with it.

Mimetic and scapegoat theory connects to American society by explaining how people live with each other on a day-to-day basis. Mimetic theory indicates that human desires result from an autonomous process even though it is a collective one (Rosic 0:10-0:30). In this case, human beings want things because others want them too. Scapegoating, which is based on mimetic theory, allows a person to develop their identity over an item or another person. People do not desire something because of their intrinsic value or because they have an investment in it, but because of imitating other people's desires. This might explain why American citizens have an American dream whereby each person has a desire to live a good life by putting in needed efforts.
