gate a tap came to the street door and he went to open it There he saw a tall somewhat haggard looking man in a shabby black coat the vision gradually dawned upon him till it reached the minuteness of all these particulars his hat pulled down on to his projecting eyebrows and his shoes very dusty as with a long journey on foot it was a hot Sunday he remembered that who looked at him very strangely and without a word pushed him aside and went straight into his grandmother s parlour shutting the door behind him He followed not doubting that the man must have a right to go there but questioning very much his right to shut him out When he reached the door however he found it bolted and outside he had to stay all alone in the desolate remainder of the house till Betty came home from church
