26.1 Electromagnetic Waves

2014 ScienceDirect Research Program Document CAA325-NSF X-00000

As An Editor, Ananthanarayan Sengupta, Jeff Kiang

Electromagnetic waves are studied with applications to geophysical subsurface probing,<sup>[1,2]</sup> Smith–Purcell radiation from metallic gratings,<sup>3</sup> scattering from interconnected plate,<sup>4</sup> and with the intensity of snowfall focus wave mode.<sup>5</sup> The electromagnetic field due to dipole antennas in a two-layer periodic medium, such as the DDA, is solved using the quasi-static approximation,<sup>6</sup> no variations in integral forms are calculated with finite time numerical integration methods, the multi-image approach with the sweeping aspect method, the modal approach by finding the residues, and a hybrid approach combining the latter two methods.<sup>7</sup> The Smith–Purcell radiation problem which takes into account the phenomena properties of metallic gratings is solved.<sup>8</sup> An electron beam moving across the surface of a metallic grating will cause emission of electromagnetic radiation. It is shown that maximum radiation occurs when the surface plasmon mode is excited. The scattering problem involving interconnected plates is solved with the help of the method of moments.<sup>9</sup> By defining independent basis functions on overlapping conductors and then joining them at the common edges, we can model complex structures efficiently while satisfying Kirchhoff's current law on the surface of the conductors. The focus wave modes refer to electromagnetic waves that run on a localized two-dimensional plane and propagate at the speed of light without dispersing. We have shown that such waves must have infinite electromagnetic energy in the source-free, three-dimensional space.<sup>10</sup> A general formula on dual partitions is considered set of basis wave modes with Helmholtz-Green's function method is developed.
