Abstract: The objective of this research is to develop a useful procedure that allows the collection, analysis, processing and updating of pavement conditions data, with the vision of generating inputs for the implementation of sustainable strategies for maintenance and rehabilitation of roads, based on pavement management systems. The relevance of this proposal lies in the fact that road management agencies in most of the developing countries have limited resources, staff and data to plan the interventions carried out on road networks. The proposed model comes from a work that has been done since 2014 to date, on the Centinela-La Rumorosa Highway, located in the state of Baja California, Mexico. Results integrate data gathered from analyzing the surface and structural conditions of its pavement and the study area, as well as the operating conditions of the road, including a georeferencing process in order to determine critical points in the network, and simulation to determine the effects of maintenance work carried out annually. It is concluded that the proposed planning model contributes to the improvement of highway performance, since it allows planning and administering the allocation of resources in making appropriate maintenance and rehabilitation decisions. Additionally, it allows to generate valuable inputs for pavement management systems implementation. The foregoing allows road management agencies in developing countries to provide a quality transportation system to their users.

Keywords: pavement maintenance and rehabilitation; pavement management systems; pavement survey data analysis; road administration

1. Introduction

An important number of agencies, companies and organizations have adopted a sustainable approach that focuses on the economic, environmental and social impacts in planning and decision-making [1]; on this matter, pavement management has become increasingly important to the extent that, with the passing of time, roads age and deteriorate. On the one hand, roads have been designed and built for a useful life and it is necessary to take actions to increase their service cycle; on the other hand, funding levels are increasingly limited and better resource management is required in order to attend to a global mobility system that is mostly focused on the use of roads [2]. Pavement Management Systems (PMS), are the set of procedures and tools that are intended to assist road management organizations in the systematic application of processes related to pavement management, particularly the identification of optimal alternatives for network conservation in the short and medium term, as well as the development of maintenance and rehabilitation (M&R)
