

19th Century: The Age of Rigor in Mathematics

- Mathematical growth during the 19th Century was no less remarkable.
- At the end of the 18th Century elementary algebra and calculus had been firmly established. To the synthetic geometry of the Greeks had been added analytic geometry combining algebra and geometry. Modern notations and concepts were mostly in place. Research journals had been established to disseminate mathematical knowledge. Universities had become centers of learning, and other schools and textbooks were becoming more common place. New fields of probability and expansions of geometry had been started. The modern age of mathematics was going strong. The stage was set for rapid mathematical growth.
- During the 19th Century the field of Real Analysis was firmly established providing rigorous foundations for calculus and related mathematics from the previous two centuries.
- Rigorous proof was brought to the forefront.
- Entire new fields of mathematics were developed, often with more and more abstraction. The age of modern Pure Mathematics had arrived.
