Bakhtin, Multichronotopic

- The cinema in particular, and audio-visual media in general, is in Bakhtinian terms “multichronotopic.” Although Bakhtin develops his concept of the “chronotope” (from chronos, time, and topos, place) to suggest the inextricable relation between time and space in the novel, it also seems ideally suited to the cinema as a medium where “spatial and temporal indicators are fused into one carefully thought-out concrete whole.” (It also spares us the absurdity of “choosing” between time and space as theoretical focus.) Bakhtin’s description of the novel as the place where time “thickens, takes on flesh, becomes artistically visible” and where “space becomes charged and responsive to the movements of time, plot and history” seems in some ways even more appropriate to film than to literature, for whereas literature plays itself out within a virtual, lexical space, the cinematic chronotope is quite literal, splayed out concretely across a screen with specific dimensions and unfolding in literal time (usually 24 frames per second), quite apart from the fictive time-space specific films might construct. Thus cinema embodies the inherent relationality of time (chronos) and space (topos); it is space temporalized and time spatialized, the site where time takes place and place takes time.
- The multi-track nature of audio-visual media enables them to orchestrate multiple, even contradictory, histories, temporalities, and perspectives. They offer not a “history channel,” but rather multiple channels for multifocal, multiperspectival historical representation. What interests me especially here is a kind of matching between representations of the palimpsestic, multi-nation state and the cinema as a palimpsestic and polyvalent medium which can stage and perform a transgressive hybridity. Constitutively multiple, the cinema is ideally suited for staging what Néstor-García Canclini, in a very different context, calls “multi-temporal heterogeneity.” ▢ The obvious fact that dominant cinema has largely opted for a linear and homogenizing aesthetics where track reinforces track within a Wagnerian totality in no way effaces the equally salient truth that the cinema (and the new media) are infinitely rich in polyphonic potentialities. ▢ The cinema makes it possible to stage temporalized cultural contradictions not only within the shot, through mise en scène, décor, costume, and so forth, but also through the interplay and
