Abstract. This article investigates the impact of energy renovation on the indoor environmental quality of apartment building during heating season. The study was performed in one residential building before and after its renovation. Energy auditing and classification of the selected building into energy classes were carried out. Additionally, evaluation of indoor air quality was performed using objective measurements and subjective survey. Thermal environment and concentration of CO₂ was measured in bedrooms. Higher concentrations of CO₂ was observed in the residential building after its renovation. The concentrations of CO₂ in some cases exceeded the recommended maximum limits, especially after implementing of energy saving measures on the building. The average air exchange rate was visible higher before renovation of the building. The current study indicates that large-scale of renovations may reduce the quality of the indoor environment in many apartments, especially in the winter season.

1 Introduction

Most of the residential buildings in Slovakia that were built in the 20th century do not satisfy the current requirements for energy efficiency presented in the national building code. Nationwide remedial measures have been taken to improve the energy efficiency of these buildings and reduce their energy use [2]. However, since the impact of these measures on indoor air quality is rarely considered, they often compromise indoor air quality due to the decreased ventilation and infiltration rate.

The highest development in the housing stock, as a result of economic changes and population growth, was recognized during the second half of the 20th century [1].

The majority of housing in Central and Eastern Europe was constructed from panel technology. The degradation of its quality which has led to its renovation, has become one of the most important measures from an energy-saving point of view.

The aim of the study was to evaluate the impact of basic energy-saving measures on energy demand of the building and indoor air quality in a typical high-rise residential building built in the 1960s in Slovakia.

2 Building description

The residential building investigated (Figure 1.) is located in Samorin, Slovakia. It was built in 1964 from lightweight concrete panels. The building was naturally ventilated. Exhaust ventilation was only used in sanitary rooms, such as the bathrooms and toilets. Renovation of the building was carried out in 2015 and included the following measures: insulation of the building envelope using polyethylene (80 mm), insulation of the roof using mineral wool (120 mm) and hydraulic balancing of the heating system. New plastic frame windows had already been installed in recent over the last years in most of the apartments in the building. [3]
