

Internet service types and speeds: Which one is for you?

Wondering which type of internet service is best for you? Read on to find out how each type works, its average speed and price and its pros and cons.

Which internet service type is right for you?

Fiber internet

Fiber is the fastest and most technologically advanced internet option on the market today. It uses fiber optic cable to relay data which travels as fast as 70% of the speed of light. Fiber internet can reach up to 2000 Mbps in speed and is ideal for multiple users with several devices.

PROS:

- Not as susceptible to bad weather
- Fastest download speeds

CONS:

- Limited availability
- Pricier plans

Cable internet

Cable internet uses the same infrastructure as cable television. Its speed may not be as fast as fiber, but cable internet can reach 1000 Mbps. Because cable internet shares bandwidth with other users in the area, you may experience slower speeds during peak hours.

Uses the same cable for TV and internet

PROS:

- Faster than average download speeds
- Affordable plans

CONS:

- Longer lock-in periods
- Slows down at peak times

Uses the same cable for phone and internet

DSL internet

DSL internet uses the infrastructure of an existing telephone network and transports data through the same wiring. Its signal may be slower the farther a user is from the main network and may not be the most reliable for 4K resolution video streaming. DSL suits small households with fewer devices.

PROS:

- Widely available
- Highly affordable plans

CONS:

- Slower speeds
- Speed depends on location

How much internet speed do you need?

Different internet types offer different speeds. How much internet speed you need depends on your household and day-to-day activities.

of devices used daily	1 - 3	4 - 9	10+
of people WFH	0	1 - 2	3+
Video streaming	HD streaming	HD streaming	4K
