

A Caesium-137 budget approach to the investigation of sediment delivery from a small agricultural drainage basin in Devon, UK

D.E. WALLING, S.B. BRADLEY & C.J. WILKINSON
Department of Geography
University of Exeter
Exeter, UK

ABSTRACT The potential for using a Caesium-137 budget for a small drainage basin to elucidate the pattern of sediment delivery and more particularly the relative importance of erosion, deposition and sediment yield is introduced. Preliminary results of applying this approach to a small agricultural drainage basin are reported. These indicate an overall sediment delivery ratio for the cultivated portion of the basin of 3.5 percent. Within this zone it is estimated that the sediment delivery ratio associated with erosion and redistribution of sediment in the cultivated fields is 48 percent and that only 7.2 percent of the material transported from the fields reaches the catchment outlet. Suggestions for developing the approach further are advanced.

INTRODUCTION

In a recent paper, Walling (1983) pointed to the importance of an improved understanding of the processes of sediment delivery interposed between on-site erosion and sediment yield at the outlet of a drainage basin and to the need for further investigations of this aspect of drainage basin behavior. One of the major problems facing such investigations is the lack of existing measurement techniques capable of documenting the deposition, storage and remobilization of sediment within the drainage basin conveyance system. Virtually all values of sediment delivery ratio available in the literature are, for example, only tentative estimates based on a comparison of measured downstream sediment yield with an estimate of gross upstream erosion. The latter is commonly derived from an estimate of sheet erosion produced by a soil loss equation such as the USLE, corrected to take account of additional contributions from channel and gully erosion, and is therefore open to considerable uncertainty.

One approach to the study of erosion and deposition within a basin which may, however, offer considerable potential for elucidating delivery processes is the use of Caesium-137 (^{137}Cs) as a natural tracer of soil and sediment movement. Caesium-137 is present in the environment only as a product of the atmospheric testing of nuclear devices during the late 1950s and early 1960s and fallout of this environmental radioisotope was first documented in 1954. Rates of fallout reached a maximum in 1964 and declined rapidly after the nuclear test ban treaty (cf. Ritchie et al., 1975; Pennington et al., 1976). Existing evidence indicates that on reaching the soil surface as fallout, ^{137}Cs is rapidly and strongly adsorbed in the upper horizons of the soil and that further downward translocation by physico-chemical processes is limited (cf. Tamura, 1964). Subsequent movement of ^{137}Cs is therefore associated with the erosion, transport and deposition of sediment particles (e.g. Rogowski & Tamura, 1970a, b; Campbell et al., 1982). Caesium-137 has a half-life of 30.1 years and approximately 60 percent of the total input of this
