lost and somewhat resembles the other ribs, except the sternum and costals, which, as stated previously, are small.

The spaces between successive ribs are occupied by intercostal muscles (see page 1). Each external intercostal muscle arises from the lower border of the rib above, runs obliquely downward and medially, and inserts into the upper border of the rib below. Each internal intercostal muscle (see page 1) arises from the lower border of the rib above and runs downward and inward to insert on the upper border of the rib below. Between these two muscle layers lie the intercostal vessels, whereas the intercostal nerves lie between the internal and the external intercostal muscles.

Many muscles of the upper extremities originate from the chest wall. Among these are the pectoralis major and minor (see page 1) and the serratus anterior muscles, which originate from the anterior and lateral portions of the chest wall.

From the upper rim of the thoracic cage, several such muscles originate. The serratus anterior (see page 1) and sternocleidomastoid muscles are thin, straplike structures which arise from the superior border and posterior surface of the sternum and insert into the lower border and the thyroid cartilage, respectively. The sternoclavicular muscle (see page 1) arises as a stout vertical band from the upper border of the sternum, adjacent to the sternoclavicular joint, and as a second clavicular head from the medial third of the clavicle. The interval between the two heads is usually visible as a slight depression, behind which the apex of the lung rises from the thorax into the rest of the neck. Above this interval, the two heads of the sternoclavicular muscle unite to form a single muscular belly which passes obliquely upward, backward, and laterally, to insert into the lateral surface of the mastoid process and acromion bone.

Superficial to the sternoclavicular muscle, the external jugular vein passes perpendicularly downward from its origin at the lower border of the pectoral gland, crosses the sternoclavicular muscle, and penetrates the deep fascia of the neck to empty into the subclavian vein.

Of the deeper neck muscles, the three scalene muscles originate from the transverse processes of the cervical vertebrae.

The anterior scalene muscle inserts into the scalene tubercle of the first rib; the medial scalene muscle also attaches to the upper surface of the first rib, but more posteriorly. The posterior scalene muscle inserts on the second rib. The components of the cervical plexus emerge from the groove between the anterior and middle scalene muscles. The anterior scalene muscle is crossed laterally and anteriorly by the phrenic nerve, which originates from the cervical plexus and runs downward and behind the subclavian vein to enter the thoracic cavity. The groove between the anterior and middle scalene muscles widens inferiorly to form a triangular opening through which emerge the components of the brachial plexus and the subclavian artery. The latter, after ascending from the thoracic cavity, crosses the upper surface of the first rib, lying in the groove posterior to the scalene muscle, to enter the axilla. Parallel to the subclavian artery, but in front of the anterior scalene muscle, runs the subclavian vein.

Deep in the lower portion of the neck, under the sternoclavicular muscle, is a narrow space bordered anteriorly by the omohyoid (see page 1) and strap muscles, posteriorly by the anterior scalene muscle and prevertebral fascia, and medially by the pharynx, esophagus, trachea, and thyroid gland (see page 1). Enclosed in a common connective-tissue sheath in this space lie the common carotid artery, the internal jugular vein, and the vagus nerve. Of these, the internal jugular vein runs most superficially; the vagus nerve lies beneath, between the common carotid artery and internal jugular vein. On the left side, the thoracic duct (see page 1) crosses over the subclavian artery and runs anteriorly to empty into the proximal subclavian vein.
