Red Lustrous Wheelmade Ware: A Product of Late Bronze Age Cyprus

Kathryn Eriksson

Red Lustrous Wheelmade ware is distinguished not only by its fine red fabric but also by the shapes that were manufactured in this ware, some of which are peculiar to it. Establishing a homeland and/or manufacturing center(s) for it remains an unsettled question although the popular view is that it originates and was manufactured somewhere in North Syria or possibly Cilicia, with other centers of manufacture perhaps located on Cyprus (Table 10.1).

During my study of this ware, I have been impressed by the quantity of Red Lustrous Wheelmade found on Cyprus, by the range of shapes represented there and by the fact that many of the vessels bear pot marks which closely resemble some of the characters of the Cypso-Minoan script. The time has surely passed for rejecting Cyprus as a possible homeland for Red Lustrous Wheelmade on the grounds that the spindle bottle was a novelty in the Cypriot repertoire, or that the method of manufacture of all the shapes was too advanced for the Cypriot potters, or that the technique of burnishing used to finish the ware had been obsolete since the Middle Cypriot Period (Sjöqvist 1946, 83). It is well known now that the ancient Cypriots were, from the earliest the Middle Cypriot period, acquainted with the potter's wheel; that Plain White Wheelmade I wares and more recently Bichrome Wheelmade ware are happily accepted as being of Cypriot manufacture (see Sjöqvist 1940, 88; Knapp & Marchant 1982, 19 with references). Red Lustrous Wheelmade may show an advanced technique of manufacturing but, as it does not appear in the archaeological record until the end of the Late Cypriot IA period, at least fifty years or so after the introduction of the potter's wheel in Cyprus, one could expect that there were some potters who were aware of what could be achieved with this device. I believe that the fabric and technique of manufacture of this ware are too advanced to be of Cypriot manufacture must also be seriously reconsidered. The island had a strong ceramic tradition and the quality, for example, of the Base Ring jugs (fig.

that were used most probably to export oil) to many sites in the eastern Mediterranean was extremely high (Merrillees 1968, 154, 156-157). That so much Red Lustrous Wheelmade is known from Cyprus may indeed result from the fact that we know more about both settlement and cemetery sites there than in any other of the neighboring areas because of the favorable conditions available for excavation. For example, Egyptologists have, in the past, concentrated on retrieving material from funerary contexts before settlement sites while Levantine scholars deal mainly with large, multiphase settlement sites. It is claimed by some that North Syria and Cilicia may be the areas in which Red Lustrous Wheelmade originates (Table 10.1), even though thorough surveys, let alone excavation of these areas are lacking. However, looking at the facts as they are available today, that this ware is closely associated with Cyprus and the ancient Cypriots cannot be doubted. To me, it seems that this very fine class of pottery can claim Cyprus as its homeland.

A map showing the distribution of the ware on Cyprus (Fig. 10.1) indicates that it is found at sites located throughout the island, although it is not well represented in the far southwest (see SCE IV PL I C, 198-200 for a record of occurrences). Major concentrations can be noted for Kasiophani (LC I-LC III) in the north, Enkomi (LC I-LC III) on the east coast and Hala Sultan Tekke (LC III) on the island's southwest coast. Outside Cyprus (Fig. 10.2) the ware is found all the way down the Nile Valley into Nubia, extensively throughout Palestine and at some sites in Lebanon and Syria, up into Cilicia and at sites on the Amanian Plateau, and at sites on a few Mediterranean islands. However, the pattern of distribution provides only a general picture outside of the bounds of a relative chronological framework. It is only when the deposits in which Red Lustrous Wheelmade has been found are placed within such a framework that we come a step closer to reading the pachtastic record as witnessed by this class of ceramic.
