

Vaccine Type	Definition	Immune Response	Examples
Subunit, acellular	Well-defined part(s) of the organism is purified and used as an antigen (e.g. proteins, peptides, polysaccharides, inactivated toxins)	A fragment of the "whole agent" vaccine can create an immune response	Acellular pertussis vaccine
Conjugate	Poorer antigens (such as bacterial polysaccharides) are chemically linked to a carrier protein	Addition of other proteins (via conjugation) confers the immunological attributes of the carrier to the antigen, and thus evokes a stronger immune response; effective approach for younger children	- Haemophilus influenza type b (Hib) conjugate vaccine - Pneumococcal conjugate vaccine - Meningococcal C conjugate vaccine - Meningococcal (A, C, Y, W-135) conjugate vaccine
DNA/RNA	Genetic material from the pathogen enter into human cells and use the cell's "equipment" to produce some protein(s) of the pathogen encoded by the gene(s)	Immune system detects protein as a foreign or harmful antigen, produces an immune response, also will prepare a response against whole pathogen	AIDS vaccine (in development)
Recombinant	Defined genes are incorporated into plasmid vehicle to allow for the production of large quantities of well-defined proteins, which are then used as vaccines	Immune response can be modified and targeted by insertion of specific genetic sequences	- Hepatitis B vaccine - Human papillomavirus (HPV) vaccine - AIDS vaccine (in development)
