Campbell,2020-11-09 This book examines the quality and nature of justice dispensed in London's magistrates courts which are the lowest level of the United Kingdom's Criminal Justice System In 2016 approximately 230 000 individuals were prosecuted for a criminal offence in these courts of whom about seventy percent pleaded guilty and were sentenced Curiously about eighty five percent of those who pleaded not guilty were subsequently tried found guilty and sentenced This book addresses a central paradox of criminal justice how is it that magistrates are able to reach a guilty verdict despite the elusive and complex nature of truth and reality Research together with observations of 238 remand hearings and 23 trials has led the author to arrive at some uncomfortable conclusions about a legal system undermined by government austerity policies and lacking in transparency This book shows that the police fail to investigate most offences that the Crown Prosecution Service is reliant on the cases which the police want prosecuted that the quality of legal representation is poor that magistrates decisions may be unjust and that most defendants are not able to understand or participate in their hearing Strikingly a large percentage of defendants are from London's precariat They are young men who are destitute or who rely on unstable incomes they are semi literate from Black and Ethnic Minority Communities and their basic rights as citizens are being eroded Because many are repeat offenders they are recycled through the Criminal Justice System with limited assistance to address the problems which cause offending Magistrates courts dispense summary justice in very short hearings which means that defendants have a limited opportunity to defend themselves In short summary justice lacks basic due process rights in a legal process which bears a striking resemblance to justice in authoritarian non democratic societies
